NEWS | Opening of the J. David Lowell Papers

Researchers now have access to the papers of J. David Lowell, a legendary consulting geologist and explorationist. The papers consist of materials on mineral exploration in the form of reports, maps, research documents, contracts, and correspondence.

Randi L. Johnson of Special Collections processed the collection. She says: "It is important because he is a key figure in the mining world. He has been part of over a dozen significant mining discoveries, such as La Escondida ore body in Chile, the world's largest copper producer." We celebrated the opening of the papers by hosting a reception with remarks from Karen Williams, VP for Information Strategy and University Libraries, and Mark Barton, incoming co-director of the Lowell Institute for Mineral Resources and Professor of Geology & Geochemistry. NEWS | Librarians Help Students Study Shakespeare with Digital Tools

This past semester, librarians Jennifer Nichols, Anthony Sanchez and Niamh Wallace helped undergraduate students use technology to explore diversity in Shakespeare. The class was invited to the iSpace in the Science-Engineering Library, where they used textual analysis, family trees, maps, websites, social media, and virtual reality. They presented their research at a conference funded by a grant from the Folger Institute at the Folger Shakespeare Library, and their projects will be added to the Folger's online suite of shared teaching tools and digital assignments.
